JOB ANNOUNCEMENT

ASSISTANT PROFESSOR: AMERICAN POLITICS AND NEWS MEDIA

The Departments of Political Science and Journalism at the University of Cincinnati seek to hire a tenure-track Assistant Professor in the area of American politics and media for a joint tenure-track appointment to begin August 15, 2016. The tenure home for the appointment will be in the Department of Political Science. We seek candidates whose research focuses primarily on politics and media in the United States. Research emphasis in campaigns and elections, political reporting, digital media, and/or related data analytics are preferred. Candidates must have strong quantitative skills, with advanced data analytical approaches preferred. Professional journalism or media experience will be a plus.

The successful candidate will be expected to conduct research, teach two courses per semester at the graduate or undergraduate levels, and make service contributions to the mission of both departments. The ideal candidate will have the ability to teach research methods courses in both departments. The successful candidate will also be attracted to the multidisciplinary relationship between political science and journalism, and will desire to capitalize on this for research, course creation, and academic programming. A.B.D. will be considered, but Ph.D. must be in hand at the start of the appointment - August 15, 2016. Qualified and interested candidates must apply online at https://jobs.uc.edu (search “political science”). A complete application will include the online application, a letter of interest, curriculum vitae, a writing sample, evidence of successful teaching, and three letters of recommendation. After applying, please send recommendations to pamela.latham@uc.edu. Please direct questions to Prof. Stephen Mockabee, Chair, American Politics Search Committee, at stephen.mockabee@uc.edu. Review of applications will begin October 19 and continue until the position is filled.
