Michael Gott

Film and Media Studies, Program Director

"Film, television, and other screen media are relatively new in the scale of human history but are everywhere and shape how we view the world. Understanding the techniques, approaches, social and political contexts that digital media have is essential. Today's graduates will need to understand, control, and create media in their professional, civic, and private lives. Students in this major may pursue a career making screen media, film programming, or production and distribution. This program is ideal for any related goal, and provides students with a solid Liberal Arts and visual literacy background. All of our students learn to write, research, think globally, and communicate results and ideas visually. This is an exciting time in the local film community as Cincinnati has become an important site for film production; even though our focus is on theory and history of screen media, our students get many opportunities to apply what they are learning."
