Journalism

Journalism is both an interdisciplinary field and a distinct knowledge base for the critical study of media and related issues, and the development of writing, editing and observational skills in a liberal arts curriculum. An intellectual review of traditional disciplines and their biases is intrinsic to journalism studies. As such, journalism teaches critical thinking on two different levels: by questioning the view from the center (theories, methods and practices) in any given field or endeavor, and by evaluating and clearly and publicly expressing these views and concerns to either specific or mass public audiences.

Alberto Jones

Major: Journalism

Certificate: Broadcast News

Distinctions: Jim Knippenburg Memorial Scholarship

Involvement: Co-President of UC's Association of Black Journalists, History Department Correspondent and Electronic Media Coordinator, Staff Reporter for the News Record, Vice President for the Online News Association.

"I truly enjoy being a part of the UC community. Not only have I been afforded a prestigious education, but I have attained skills that I can take with me throughout life. The Department of Journalism has been very supportive of my student endeavors and in many ways has helped me get one step closer to achieving my dreams."

Future: I would like to one day become a multimedia journalist and eventually a news anchor.
