Law & Society

The Bachelor's in Law and Society was developed to meet the demand for leaders with a solid understanding of the law, and how it intersects with our society in every aspect of our personal, professional and civic relationships. Students will have the opportunity to study core subjects, such as Constitutional Law and International Law & Organizations, while also being able to choose among timely and socially relevant topics such as Cyber Security Law and Critical Issues in Domestic Justice. The multi-disciplinary approach allows you to customize your degree not only by selecting one of many pathways for degree completion. It also makes a double-major easy. You will study in an urban location with expert faculty, including area practitioners, in partnership with the Department of Political Science. You'll also graduate with the skills employers are looking for, including critical thinking, problem-solving, writing and oral communication—skills that differentiate you in the workforce.

Andrew Lewis

Andrew Lewis, Associate Professor of Political Science

Professor Lewis's research interests live at the intersection of law and politics in America, and he is particularly interested in legal advocacy, rights politics, First Amendment law, religious political behavior, and the engagement of religious groups in politics and law. Professor Lewis's research has appeared in The New York Times and many social science journals, and his award-winning book The Rights Turn in Conservative Christian Politics: How Abortion Transformed the Culture Wars (Cambridge University Press) was published in 2017.

Real-World Experience: Law and Society majors can extend their education beyond the classroom through internships with law firms, nonprofits, government officials and other organizations. In addition, students may participate in a small number of internships at College of Law legal clinics, which could include Ohio Innocence Project, Entrepreneurship and Community Development Clinic, and Civil Protection Order Clinic.

A Degree as unique as you are!

As Law and Society student, you will have the benefit of instruction from a distinguished group of faculty representing several different departments. In addition, you will be immersed in an interdisciplinary learning experience that draws upon the diverse programs within Cincinnati Arts and Sciences to meet the challenges in this area.
